This conceptual Art Rainbow designed by Billy Pilgrim is a party shelter powered by solar energy. The Art Rainbow would provide shade and a variety of tinted hues during the day, while the solar panels soak up the sun's rays and charge the shelter's batteries.

The batteries then power a myriad of colorful LED lights after dark, taking the 'eco-party' to a whole new level.

Cancer Survivor Shows Obamacare Unleashing Startups: Economy

By Jeanna Smialek - Sep 9, 2013

Maksim Tsvetovat and Tatyana Kanzaveli say they doubt they could have started their data-collection company, Open Cancer Network, without Obamacare.

Tsvetovat, 37 and the father of a four-year-old boy, said he was hesitant to quit his job as chief technology officer at a consulting firm and lose his health coverage. Even more crucially, Kanzaveli, 50, was diagnosed with colon cancer in January, less than two months after her contract job with an investment company ended. Her condition left her unable to purchase new medical insurance.

Looking like a 1-story building whose corner got lifted and pulled by a Giant, this design for a 600-apartment complex in New York City will be a green and light filled home from any height.

Punctuated w/ green terraces and skylights all over, the building will have a perfect view of the Hudson and an LEED-Gold Certification.

Solar panel installation with no up-front payments, paid off over several years from the money saved out of your power bills, began in Australia almost two years ago. In a few years, it is likely that companies will be competing with each other to pay people for the privilege of using their roofs to generate electricity.
